Generally, a battery terminal is formed by bending, and crimping a metal strip on the outer periphery of a battery terminal and welding the crimped portion. The battery terminal requires crimping strength to be applied to a wire of a battery core and welding strength to be applied to the battery core. The crimping strength is a strength which maintains the crimped portion of the metal strip closed while the battery terminal is crimped, and the welding strength is a strength which welds the metal strip to the battery core. The crimping strength and the welding strength should be designed according to the application. The design of the crimping strength and the welding strength requires an intermediate member of a terminal to be hard, a large crimping tool, etc., and thus manufacturing cost is increased and the size of the terminal is increased. In an event that the crimping strength and the welding strength are designed according to strength of a battery core, there is a problem that a desired crimping strength is not achieved due to change of the core or the core is damaged.The mitochondrial permeability transition is an important process that maintains cellular homeostasis under physiological conditions.
